Report on the Material Gnome Mission by Khan Bloodhand 27 jun 2024

We arrived at the great tall spire with a tiny manling. This tiny Manling seemed to be our boss.

He called himself Renwyl of Caelycion a banker with no experience in the wild, not smart to go out.

We went to go to the tall tower via the mage portal in Haven.

It had 10 doors,

According to the small armoured dwarf they took door 6 last time filled with water.

Khan does not like water and the banker decides to go to the 5th one.

The door led us to a magical world cloaked in an illusion of a large grass field with a long path going to a stone unremarkable house.

This world does not follow the rules of magic and runes and instead works on its own laws. Created by the entity inside this plain.

We found a small water basin in front of the door. In it was an oily substance, Khan took this but it disappeared when arriving back into our world. Inside this oil was the hilt of a sword, the sword however seemed to be as illusionary as the world itself. For it had a blade none could see and none could touch.

When entering the house we could see a dining hall. Windows that were not visible on the house exterior now lightened the room alongside a lot of candles and torches. The weather seem to darken from bright blue to a darker hue.

We found in the hall 3 painting, one of a corridor full of doors and windows letting in a storm wind at the end of the corridor stands a figure holding a purple flame. A second one of a room full of mirrors with once more a figure with a purple flame in the reflection. The last painting showed a cistern with in the middle a statue once more holding the same purple flame.

In the hall we also located the exit at the fireplace, it was covered by magic bars who could not be opened by lass Maeve her magic or brute force. With a purple candelabra in front.

With every second the darkness outside worsened and enemies seemed to appear from outside. Spectral hands and faces phased through the windows and were focused on darkening the room. The wall, now fully in the dark, became a living being intent on devouring us. Making it clear that we should avoid the darkness at all costs.

Due to the idiotic genius of my brother jumping into the cistern painting, we figured out that our task is to go into the paintings and get the purple candles located in the paintings. Upon entering the paintings they changed form. A drowning man for the cistern, a skeleton pointing at a black hole for the corridors, a man looking into his own skeleton for the mirrors.

It was a horrified sight, the house itself turning to us and the darkness taking both me and the tiny banker surrounded by it. It took him much harder than myself and I believe the little one is never going outside again. Should you ever go back into the house. Then take a lantern each, for the ghost can take an hour of fuel per attack.

Eventually, we got all of the candles and managed to get out through the fireplace. Returning to the tower and being greeted by a chest of loot and the pay promised by the tiny man.

report on the magical shard expedition written by Khan Bloodhand 8 oct 2024
(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhê)

The purpose of this expedition was to research a blue magical shard found by a party dispatched to kill demons. Märchen was to do the main research, Maeve was the original founder and Roboros and I were hired for general guard and safekeeping.

After moving a day east to ensure a safe distance we prepared for the ritual. In the preparation, Roboros and I killed some goblins in the area, further increasing the chance of a nearby nest to be found at a later date.

After a night's rest the ritual started to shrink the crystal. I do not have enough knowledge to explain what happened but it appeared to have stopped the time and be filled with the magical powers of the galaxy. After doing some manual labour Märchen was close to completing it. However, it appears that invaders from other realms could use this crystal. At first, we saw a giant ship followed by what I would consider a "scorpion dragon". We later learned that this creature was named "a dreadnought". Right before we accomplished our goal 3 purple invaders came out of the same unseen spot. They demanded we return the crystal which appeared to be something related to their way of procreating. Although I was hesitant at first Märchen allowed them to take it in return for a favor.

These purple galaxy humans were not affiliated with the bear in any way, therefor I do not trust them one bit. However, I followed Märchen's directives as I was hired to do. They took us on Märchen's request to a very warm place they call the hells. I was told this is the place where my most desirable hunt's master seems to reside, the Crimson Lady. When we arrived we found a hot and rocky terrain with many streams of molten rock. Imps flew around us, and in the distance, we were able to make out a fortress with heavy chains and giant guards. We have called this place: Quiums Chained Fortress. A hellspawn seems to have noticed us and charged it. It was quickly disposed of by our mages and the invaders. We then left, taking us to a random spot which we quickly located near the Makutu woods.

Following this logic we made our way to the Tall Spire where we could get home. On the way some vile magical wizard or something cast a spell upon us, causing my shaman to be replaced with some small elven lad. I quickly rushed to the spire and got her back. Then we went home.

If anyone finds more of these crystals, be careful of these purple invaders, they seem strong but not unkillable.

report on the second mapping expedition written by Khan Bloodhand 8 nov 2024
(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhè)

This was meant to be a simple, easy, and somewhat safe mission. It was everything but that...

I hired 3 adventurers to accompany me in search of some sort of nest or hideout rumoured to be in the area. This nest has been sending out patrols and forager squads of different degrees. To the higher-leveled adventurers, this is nothing but to the newer generations, this may become grim and deadly very quickly, especially with the innate bloodlust lurking inside these goblins that drives them to kill any person they are able to knock down.

The first day was uneventful apart from finding an abandoned house 3 hours away from Haven. A minor issue arose between the two rookies arguing over a kill. This went too far to my liking and called an end to it. We set up camp and were able to confirm that Gnolls go as far as Southwest Haven. This should be alarming and a group might be needed to thin their numbers or push them back.

Through the night a stranger arrived at our camp. This was the wizard Emma After confirming her claims that she was a strider she explained she was cut off from her party after her's was ambushed and the goblins managed to kill someone. Although sceptical I allowed her to accompany us for the remaining day north. Whatever came next no one of us could think of.

Half a day East of Haven we encountered a fortified outpost of the Goblins, they protected themselves with spikes and trenches although they did not show much interest or tactical prowess to effectively use these. We underestimated their numbers and skills and they quickly overran us. They had a variety of warriors. From so far I remember they have different kinds of casters and shamans. (Khan continued to name and categorised them from weak to strong)

- Pawns
 - Weaker and often able to be taken down by a well-placed hit.
 - Effective in great numbers.
 - Will try and surround their target.
 - Seems to only come forward after their chief commands it.
 - Estimated kill count: 15
- Throwers
 - Focus on ranged weapons, often very primitive.
 - Attacks rapidly and manages to get multiple hits in quickly.
 - Weaker armour and morale
 - Estimated kill count: 5
- Shamans
 - Able to cast certain elemental magics.
 - Weak in close combat
 - About 2 spell slots
 - Estimated kill count: 3
 - Outpost had a head Shaman able to summon more powerful elements.
- Sneaky gitz
 - Prefer to attack with small weapons
 - Also able to attack rapidly with multiple hits.
 - Sneaky, they will try and hide after dealing a successful hit and rarely let their prey go.
 - Estimated kill count: 4
- Priests
 - They prefer to cast inflict wounds, this makes them a great danger to rookies who might be killed in a single hit.
 - High priority targets
 - Have not seen them heal others.
 - Able to cast around 2 spell slots.
 - Estimated kill count: 3
- Chief
 - A greatly adorned goblin who managed to lock down and almost cause my own demise.
 - Uses mental attacks able to pierce through armour.

- We eventually won after Emma sacrificed herself. I almost bled out. We managed to loot the camp but we have not gotten the time to burn it down. A larger faction might (re)claim it. However, for the recent future, I believe we have secured the area of the goblin patrols.

We arrived at the clan grounds 6 days north. This was clearly a camp of hill giants. Some possessed magical capabilities of some sorts but these were highly in the minority and mostly due to items. Although they would be a problem as enemies, they would not be undefeatable.

During the tournament, our party cheated with magic to push the favor to Ottask. I disagreed with this move but eventually we won. The chief surrendered his role to Ottask and adding us a new ally. However would Ottask have been able to win without our help. What if another challenger appears and we are not there to help him.

(Flightless Dragons)

Report on the Flying Stones expedition written by Khan Bloodhand 12 dec 2024
(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhê)

We moved out a day or 2 after the dragon attacked Haven. Normally Lady Frill would lead this expedition to satisfy her curiosity however she seemed to have her hands full dealing with the wounded from that find. Me, Barrek, and Vivian would move out ourselves and report back to her.

We left through the North Western gate, and we followed the northern bank of the Fish People River, (I believe he might mean the Sahuagin) believing this was where we could find the Aviary. After half a day of travelling, we decided to set up camp near the edge of Resin Creek Forest, giving Vivian time to make her tree move with magic. We were interrupted by some weird beast troop led by some big deer-looking thing. It seems against the magic of Vivian but after Barrek started talking to squirrels it seems just concerned where we dispose of it. Making sure we have to keep it in the forest and she was allowed to continue the ritual.

During that night we got a visit by a strider with many magic items. She called herself Shanty and appeared to bring letters for Vivian and my Brother. These were congratulations for killing something called a hag or something. We seemed suspicious for other reasons but Barrek decided to read her mind to see if she really was a strider. This took too long so I went to sleep, I wasn't woken to the sound of battle so I suppose they must have been alright.

After continuing our travels we arrived at the usual spots. The Fish People portal with the two towers and a chain, and a day after that the Beaver Lake. On the way here there seemed to be some hostilities as a spear was lobbed at us from the water. Still need to convince Frill to have us find these river trolls and aide them in this fight against the fishes. Moving North from Beaver Lake we found many trees marked by the Fish. After a bit we once again moved into the Everplains dotted with smaller ruins. Camping here we found 2 trolls that seemed friendly, they were also enemies of the Hag and seemed to hang out with a bloke named Ulridan. We continued West, Vivian stepping on one of the thorns she said is affiliated to the Hag, Maybe this would be the same ones that Dear Leona told me about she saw around an effigy. This time a vile lightning storm started to rise for the rest of the expedition. However, those templefolk who say that lightning is a way for god to smite the unjust seem to be wrong. Or their god must be really weak. I took 2 bolts directly and barely made a scratch.

Once more we eventually reach a familiar-looking Resin Creek Forest after half a day, even seeing the river again as my map might suggested. However, moving further West for a day we found a different forest with enormous trees that made me feel surprisingly not big. We continued until we found some very large dragons. Most of these did not fly or breath fire, there seemed to be one that walked on 2 legs with a very large jaw and one that seemed to be the largest beast the Bear must have made rivalling its size. Vivian told me these were not dragons but I am not sure if I am sure about that. They seem to fit the bill. The ones with the big jaw were called Tyrano (Khan seems to stutter with the name), A trex. However out of nowhere came something resembling more of a monster version of this Trex to attack the two, swallowing one whole. We joined the fight and Vivian allowed me to become such a fierceless trex with Barrek riding my head into battle. Safe to say we killed it and took its flesh, bones, teeth, and leather.

Eventually, we decided that the Aviary was not gonna be found, it seems we did not guess right on what way we should have taken. Next time perhaps try going directly west from Haven. We decided to finish our quest going north once more. Apparently, if we went west any further we would have reached an unending collection of water. I dislike that idea. (The sea?) After a day of travel, we reached a hilly terrain and some time even later we arrived at something I haven't had the pleasure of seeing before in this world. A castle made from blackened stone. It seemed strong and well-placed, reminding me a lot of those castles the humans were in when we came for missions.

Both my brother and Vivian seemed somewhat afraid of it, I told them the only reason that they should be afraid is the ballistas on top but if they are not manned what is the harm? Barrek heard a voice in his head, a lady called Osanna Von Sclaer seemed to invite us for dinner, promising us a feast we wouldn't forget. I got interested but both him and Vivian declined and seemed to go away. This pissed off our host who send some tiny things out for us. It was a tough fight, they used a lot of magic. But we eventually killed them without to much issue. Sadly they faded when we did, there was no head to bring back home. Seems to be a dangerous place for newer people, don't go without protection.

M̥t̥ ʁ̥ ʁ̥ M̥ ʁ̥ N̥ S̥ M̥ ʁ̥ f̥ X̥ ʁ̥ t̥ (Enormous Dragon) report on the Bluey Dragon expedition written by Khan Bloodhand 28 jan 2025

(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhê)

We left Haven to the western gate. The target was the fabled Dragon Mountain in the Creek that was rumoured to be home to the large Blue Dragon that had saved Haven before. We wanted to establish speaking terms and try and get on his good side since the attacks came. The way seem to be one already made by a mission some time ago, read the chronicles of adventurer Lila.

We traveled with 3 high levelled adventurers westward without little interference on the road. We are to strong to be stopped by Robbers, or Gnolls. After a day we arrived at some ruins where Frill is able to tell us there are live Stone Giants. I do not know why but perhaps a combination of the search for danger, greed, and a divine judgement caused me and Roboros to destroy these beings. They are surprisingly strong so do look out. We managed to find several special roses alongside the big gems on the Giants chest. We continued our journey afterwards.

Continuing a day west we gotten into a very dense woodland that seemed different from the rest of the Creek. In the dark there were several grey humanoid monkey-esque creatures with dark eyes and blood gushing out of their maw. They were smart to keep their distance while we travelled through these dense woods or I would have added their heads to my shrine. Eventually, as night decent we found ourselves at the foot of the Mountain. The mountain was not the most difficult to climb especially with the aide from tools however what made this climb difficult was the exceedingly strengthening storm. Large waves of rapid lightning strikes occurred and occasionally hit us and huge winds kept us slow. Eventually, we met an elder bugbear. Frill believes this person might have some shapeshifting abilities. They did not seem bothered by the storm that would normally prove detrimental for someone of such age and small build. Later we learned this might be a creature that has syphoned the power of a dragon Ascension. Further information about this man's whereabouts will be rewarded by Khan.

Following deeper into the mountains we found a group of blue kobold followers. While I did not understand their chanting it seemed mostly religious and Frill tells me they were awaiting the ascension with great enthusiasm. We quickly had to take cover as a huge amount of electrical power flashed trough the mountains. These tiny kobolds than became small dragonlings, I believed Frill called them Wyrmlings. This may also be the reason of the rumoured syphoning of the Dragon's power.

We continued further and eventually the mountain itself gave up around the power of the Dragon. According to Frill it was in the middle of its ascension, whatever that meant. Soon the mountain split up in large floating boulders, hanging hundreds of feet in the air connected by lightning. This is where we got attacked by a huge amount of recovering air, lightning and dust spirits. The fight was hectic and eventually with a huge shockwave, we all passed out.

When I recovered I saw before me the largest dragon ever. A colossal blue beast that landed before us. It shared with us the wisdom it had. Mostly it did not seem aggressive to Haven and confirmed it had no benefit to its destruction. It seemed to mumble about an age of dragon infighting. It distributed further great wisdom to each of us alongside filling some of our items with the greater power of a dragon. It told us it might be interested in posting quests in the future for when he has a need for us striders. It then allowed us to RIDE ITS FRICKING BACK TO HAVEN! (Khan shouted this).

Overall the Dragon seemed to remain neutral if not agreeable with us as long as we remain good allies with the Wyrmblood Kobolds.

report on the Call of the Deep mission written by Khan Bloodhand Feb 2025
(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhê)

Transcriber note: When Khan came to me he seemed enraged far beyond his usual state. It appears that he believes the enemies and misfortunes he encountered today were send by the god Iyastar. He even went as far as call the god a dark fiend that puppeteers people and his report shows his believes quite clearly so I will do my best to identify the troublesome parts. I made sure to keep my door close lest he get in trouble but someone needs to help him, not me though. I'm not paid to be a therapist.

"We set out Southward to get to those runes of Runfyr. Apparently there were issues last time we sent striders there. I heard you got killed over there. Seems we both have issues there. When we arrived, the lake had a ton of ice. More so than the last reports would suggest. Unnatural spikes of ice rose from the water. If that wasn't a sign enough that something terrible has a hold on that ruin, then the water should make it clear. It was oily and vile. Yet alluring as can be, Roboros drank, but his stomach couldn't handle it. Further magic was observed at night. The moon shone as bright as the sun. An ill omen for what was to come, I'm certain of it."

"When we got into the water, the first thing we noticed was that the slime had expanded, covering nearly every surface of the ruins. We kept our guard up as we knew of the Fishfolk hiding in it. Finding the cave in all the goo was no easy feat. When we entered, we eventually found a rune. It lit up, but to this day, I have no idea what it would do. Deeper we found your previous companions. Goblinoid undeath. They were with the fishfolk in these icy waters. It did not take a lot of effort to dispose of them. We afterwards found a weird little kobold in these caves. I do not know where they came from or what they did, but they showed us the way."

"We eventually gotten into a large room where the vile false god made his presence known. A statue to depict their full glory was in the middle of the room, surrounded by all manner of wall paintings, murals, I think the word is. They depicted some sort of history. But I'm sure that whatever they show here is far from the truth. An army of angels clashing, a mountain being moved, a city lifted from the ground, a meteor moving down, and a divine figure. We put a weapon and scroll in the hands of the statue. This showed the path to several treasures and what would be a death trap if not for the fact we were underwater. This was the first instance of the false idol showing their true colours.”

“We ended up in front of the cathedral dedicated to this god of law. We first believed this structure to be a place of security as we slept to regain some power. Inside this cathedral, there lay a sword in a stone. We believed it a gift, or a cry for help to be reclaimed to the known world, or perhaps a reward for clearing this holy place. But how wrong we were. Roboros and I tried to pull the blade out, but only the full extent of my strength was needed to pull it out. When we pulled the blade out, a surge of radiance came from it, and it killed our kobold guide and wounded the rest of us.”

“The sword was no gift from god, but a cursed object from a conniving devil. During the night we were ambushed by waves of the Ryndel Fishfolk. The curse that the sword infused in us made Roboros and I go insane and to attack our loved ones. This was the last straw, we had to retreat from the demons hiding in the shadows of the cathedral. I made sure to topple the statue and vowed to return to finish the job.”

report on the rightful heir mission written by Khan Bloodhand May 2026

Send by some poem or whatnot we were told to investigate it. Apparently some watery tart was lobbying knives at anyone who accepted her challenge. I would never ignore a proper challenge but this one did not really peaked my interest. Yet Lady Frill and my brother seemed more than interested so I feared I had no choice but to follow them. Vivian accompanied us on our travels as well.

Being one of the longest missions to the date, we had spent a total of 6 days away. With our start at the riftgate it was about the distance of 8 to 10 days away from Haven. What follows is a travel log taken by Lady Frill and indoctrinated in my map.

We started moving South-East for 4 days.

The first day was uneventful. Moving through the scarlands was nothing to write about. Some minor insectoids and imps that moved around us. They were smart enough not to dare and interfere with us. We couldn't be bothered by them.

At the beginning of the second day we arrived at a new area at the time. The Verdan Scythe, stupid name, should have called it the pinewood or something. Either way we moved further. We stumbled upon the coast of the Blue Expanse to our south. Huge cliffs made a pretty sight, with at the bottom of the bay a shipwreck which we took some time plundering further. Unbeknownst to us we were watched by an enemy. Vivian was the first to notice that we were surrounded by a familiar tribe of Goblins. The Gut Cutters. Yet to my surprise, I have fought them before next to Haven, they have expanded all the way out here. Or perhaps this was where their stronghold sat. Whatever the case around the end of the second day we were ambushed by a party of goblins. Most of them were easily disposed of apart from one unique individual. A goblin lass wielding a hammer twice her size. She was a great adversary, being able to escape my grip not through dexterity but through her own powerful display. She even managed to push me away. Yes I remember her fondly and if I ever got the chance, I'd be resurrecting her to serve my cause. (Khan proceeds to show me a gilded skull of presumably the goblin female he was fighting.)

On the third day we continued our trip through the pine forest. We had received word that the Chromatic covenant, an enemy draconid faction, had set their eyes upon us and that we should expect a challenge sooner or later. They seemed much more arrogant than we had originally planned, I had no interest in their mind games. The others seemed more troubled by the fact that the message was sent by a captured innocent man. At the end of the day we found a unique statue in the middle of the forest. A metallic constructed scorpion covered by runes. We believe this might have been a creation of the Gorro Ora Orcs, an enemy orc faction.

On the fourth day we arrived at a clearing in the forest. We found several magically enchanted sheep that seemed to be afflicted by a multitude of spells. Frill's clever insight allowed us to find out these were the Zutaagi Jigen orcs that seemed to have meddled once more with the wildmagic. As soon as we tried to interact and bring them to safety we were attacked by the previously mentioned Gorro Ora orcs. They were no match to us and I took my sweet time 'interrogating' one of our captives. We found out they have a strong chieftain set up, use runes they have learned from their superiors, and their camp being 2 to 3 days east from the current position.

Day 4 we continued further, passing flowerfields to our south. This day passed without much trouble. It is highly advised to explore these fields further but nothing more of note.

Day 5 we moved south, continuing through the Verdan Scythe with the flowerfields to our east. At the end of the day we were awoken by prisoners of the Chromatic Covenant, saying that an attack will be launched by them during the night. Having the time to prepare we ensured that the area was covered in oil and ready to burn when they attacked. To much of my partners dismay, they used these prisoners as combatants. Quite sad but they had to be put down anyway, for their fear of the captors was misplaced for they should have feared me more. I put most out of their misery but it is clear Lady Frill was quite hit by them. This shows their capabilities and willingness to use underhanded tactics, yet also highlights the degree of arrogance and desire for combative challenges they have.

Finally we arrived at our destination, a warm beach at the southern banks of the Blue Expanse. We did not see the challenger but she would soon have revealed her. Explaining matters of difficulty with the parums in her homeland or something, I was not really paying attention. She made use of moth spirits who turned to knights while dueling Baerrek, and just like a true rockeater warrior Baerrek was able to defeat her and earn himself his new sword.

report on the keep on following expedition written by Khan Bloodhand May 2025

(Transcribed by Guild Clerk Laowai Xhê)

We travelled outside of Haven with a powerful but small team: Myself, Roboros Scourge of the Fishfolk, and the most prominent wizard in Haven, Märchen. Our objective was clear and unknown at the same time. Just like last time we would follow Gambker's unwavering pull. Whatever this blade demanded of me it was far up North-West.

The first couple of days were easy and unnoteworthy. We followed the creek and quickly and easily dispatched of any threat making its way towards us. With one exception. One of these cultists of the false god (Most likely referring to priest of Iyaster.) made her way with both across the recently cleared river. Typical, not working for its purpose but profiting from it when all the fighting is done. Worse enough its that one that used to be a strider but gave up after the threat of death became clear. If you can't handle the heat, don't enter the kitchen. Märchen tactfully went in to talk alone while me and Roboros were out hunting.

It seems cultists aren't the only enemies that suddenly come up to attack. When camping in the Juran Tallwood, we were ambushed by a pair of devils. However, unlike the followers of that lying entity, these were clear in their origin and their purpose. Demons sent to me by the Crimson Lady. What a surprisingly pleasant encounter it was after all the subterfuge and deceit that lately plagued my missions. One of the Devils seemed to be almost dancing, taking great pleasure in the blood it pulled from its victim. After attacking me occasionally, it moved on to Märchen, a dreadful mistake. I crushed its spine soon after. The second devil was a large creature capable of advanced magic and powerful sight. These devils seem to be able to play into my curse it found out after its attempt of infiltration in Haven. It made the hunger call to me.

After this fight, we continued our trek. A day west and a day north made us reach a mountainous terrain. From the large vantage points we were able to see the entrances of caves, Driders, oozes, and other depth creatures were spotted. Not long after we were visited by what appeared to be a female Giant Chieftess riding ontop of a huge bird. She claims that the creatures are being called from the depths, or rather pushed from below. She told us her clan was nearby, however we had no time to search for that.

The sword guided us down into the caverns. After a small time exploring we found an old civilisation buried underneath the mountain. It was dusty and the pathway outside has not been trodden for some time. This seemed to be a small settlement complete with tavern and even a large monument. A statue towards what appeared to be a gemlike dragon, so whatever lived here must have worshipped them. Kobolds most likely.

Our price was on the chest of a Dark Dwarf. An armour of exquisite make. Sturdy and durable but showing large signs of aging, exactly what we sought. After a brief diplomatic talk a fight became clear. I'd say I used self defence but that would be a lie. We were the aggressors and took from them, however this is as it is for the martial communities that I know. In the fighting we were subjected to the powerful magic of the priestess and we lost Roboros. A glorious loss of life that I repaid 3fold.

report on the Groll Gates expedition written by Khan Bloodhand May 2025
(Transcribed by Guild Clerck Laowai Xhè)

We were sent several days south, into the thick jungles of the Makutu woods, a ruined old fortress is a day and a half southwest of the Tall Spire. When we arrived, we concluded quickly that the fortress was filled to the brim with the vile pests.

We concluded several facts: the Gnolls were able to multiply their numbers in a rapid timespan. Several missions ago, we had seen several fortresses destroyed. In the northern Howling Woods, the undead and demonic tribes had already suffered heavy attacks, destroying their fortresses by both our hands and the hands of others.

This fortress was of the tribe that showed no tendency towards fiends or the undead. They showed only power through savagery and primal carnage. From the numbers we found it seems that these were the strongest of the three tribes. However we found an even worse truth in the camp. Representatives of both the undead and the fiendish gnolls. These creatures do not only have the common sense to band together between tribes but also to fight together to each other's strength. This spells grave news if all 3 are joining in alliance for dark purpose.

What we found is that these primal gnolls fight mostly relying on sheer numbers and savagery, although they possess quite a strong number of both warriors and ranged hunters it seemed that the only spellcasters and summoners were from the other tribes.

This battle also gave us an insight in another enemy. The Skarn wyvern, that blasted beast appeared at the battle. Commanded and puppeteered by the traitor strider Wycian who killed striders earlier. While he killed multiple gnolls, they had to retreat after I personally took interest in killing them. Wycian once more showed his cowardice colors by retreating with his tail between his legs.

After the battle was concluded and the fortress was claimed we spotted a strange monkey who kept their eye on us from the distance, even the ever vigilant Vivian had difficulty spotting and keeping track of them. Apart from this monkey there were also members of a thieves guild that is familiar with Haven, they tried to rob us disguised as priest but they were quickly dealt with and executed in the name of Haven law.
